Carlos Little is an artist and designer living and working in a nature sanctuary in Hardwick, New Jersey. He attended the Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art where he studied art and architecture. He's currently working on an ambitious project entitled "Flush House," which aims to redefine the human relationship to domestic architecture.

Little's studio inhabited active and inactive construction sites in NYC from 2004–11. During this time he reconfigured the buildings' interiors, curated exhibitions with other artists, and produced paintings and sculptures resulting in exhibitions with Art In General in 2008 and the Knockdown Center in 2016. In 2012, he moved the studio to rural New Jersey and together with Elisa Garcia they founded At The Center, a not-for-profit organization focused on art, nature, and expanding consciousness.
