MOS Architects (New York, NY) both benefits and suffers from contradiction: architects who want to be artists, writers who want to be architects, illustrations that want to be buildings, video games that want to be paintings, buildings that want to be movies, earnestly not earnest, deliberately not deliberate, seriously not serious etc. In this way, their work is hard to place. They make things that are at once one thing and something else. They make things that are at once familiar and strange, childish and sophisticated, boring and interesting, naive and knowing, precise and vague, stable and unstable, material and immaterial, generic and specific, functional and poetic, and so on. Maybe it is work built around uniquely American narratives, but most of it exists elsewhere.
